WORKS IN PROGRESS:

Philosophical Frames on Public Policy – (under contract with Rowman & Littlefield International). This anthology will draw together leading scholars in philosophy and related fields to offer present new essays on how philosophy can illuminate policy controversies. Among the topics will be euthanasia for persistent depression, punishment, surveillance and policing, industry/academe research collaborations, procreation, political apologies, prostitution, disability, refugees, and other timely issues. Tentative TOC: The Reach of Criminal Law: Thom Brooks, “How to Punish?”; Robert Fullinwider, “Prostitution and Public Policy”; Privacy and State Oversight: Tom Sorrell, “Bulk Collection, Intrusion, and Domination”; Samantha Brennan, “Thinking Philosophically about Parenting Policies”; Themes in Research and Medical Ethics: David Resnik, “Ethical Issues in Academic/Industrial Collaborations”; Roberta Berry, “Health care, Health Diversity, and Flourishing”; Nation States and Obligations to Foreign Persons and States: Michael Blake, “Immigration in Philosophy and Policy”; Andrew I. Cohen, “Political Apologies and Historic Injustice”; Case studies in public goods: regulating biodiversity and public education: Michael Paul Nelson and John A. Vucetich, “Acceptable Risk in the Context of Policies Aimed at Stemming Biodiversity Loss: A Case Study Involving the U.S. Endangered Species Act of 1973”; Jonathan Anomaly, “Regulating Public education as a Public Good”; Difference, Identity, and the State: Chad van Schoelandt, “A Public Reason Approach to Religious Exemption”; Anita Silvers and Leslie Wolf, “Disability, Identity Justice, and the Politics of Discrimination”.

Rights to Reparation for Historic Injustices – This book manuscript in progress builds on some of my recent work and defends a right and directed duty of reparation for injustices originating in previous generations. Critics sometimes worry about claims for moral repair to transgressions predating one’s birth. They point to determinacy, nonidentity, and policy complications. But as Robert Nozick, Jeremy Waldron, and A. John Simmons warned, the failure to redress such transgressions may threaten any contemporary property claims. I defend a robust right and duty of reparation that does not require wholesale redistribution. This right and duty is a right to restitution, compensation, and apology. I develop the argument in light of six challenges. (1) Some critics ask how there can be a right to repair historic injustice; they query what it is a right to. I respond to this conceptual challenge by treating rights as a sort of normative constraint that provides pro tanto reasons for those bound by the duties these rights may impose. I treat such rights as a defeasible sort of Lockean right to satisfaction for the transgressions one suffered. I defend restricting such reparation rights and the duties they impose to the transgressor and victim. (2) Other critics (e.g., C.W. Morris, D. Boonin and others) worry that the set of rights to reparation for historic injustices might be empty since descendants of victims owe their existence to such transgressions. Drawing on previous work, I reply by treating such reparation rights as claims to repair for wrongs one suffered after one’s birth. I consider whether this approach (variants also found in G. Sher and B. Boxill) dodges nonidentity worries at the expense of any meaningful reparation rights. (3) Many writers (especially J. Spinner-Halev) say that claims to reparation are salient because of previous claims to reparation are salient because of previous injustices by groups upon other groups. However, we typically think of reparation as something specific that some identifiable individuals owe to identifiable others. How can reparation rights/duties acknowledge the significance of group membership while neither committing to dubious metaphysics nor assigning individuals undue burdens? I discuss how the right to reparation, understood as a sort of right to satisfaction for transgressions, may apply to groups in a way that is compatible with the view that individual human beings are normatively foundational. (4) Another challenge concerns “supersession,” where changing circumstances may sometimes seem to change who owns what. Jeremy Waldron is a famous proponent of this sort of view. I discuss and reject leading supersession arguments and consider how some claims to repair may persist across generations. (5) Many critics (most recently A. Valls and P. de Greiff) argue that reparation requires resolving historical narratives. I argue against this view. Parties to historic transgressions do not need to settle history. They need to agree on enough that they can live together, but only if they wish to continue to live together. Reparation rights can be satisfied even if history remains partly contested. (6) Many calls for reckoning with the past involve demands for apology. Critics will challenge what place if any apology should have in an account of reparation. They might worry that apology is inappropriate as a target of a demand. What one can demand is compensation, but the sort of emotional transformation that accompanies sincere apologies strike some authors as inappropriate objects of duties or rights (Helmreich 2015; Bennett 2008). I defend the right to an apology as part of the right to the satisfaction reparation can provide. Drawing on literature regarding a duty to love (e.g., Liao), I argue that the emotional transformation apologies entail can be suitable targets for commands. I discuss how this bears on groups and how a right to apology as reparation is compatible with many distributive entitlements.

“Reasons, Humor, Fitness” – D’Arms and Jacobson warn against the “moralistic fallacy,” which holds that moral considerations bear on judgments of fitness about being amused. Some recent critics argue that it need not be fallacious for moral considerations might nevertheless enable or disable various reasons for having certain evaluative responses. I argue that such conditions do not intrude on fitness but are instead only relevant to judgments about whether or not it is morally acceptable to find something amusing.

“Apologies to Thin Skinned Victims” – Some corrective justice theorists hold that apologies can be claimed or owed by justice. It is unclear, however, whether and how justice should govern apologies, especially given the variability in avowed demands and needs for them. Some victims move on, some ruminate in anger, some withdraw in despair. We often hold that wrongdoers take victims as they find them and must compensate for the damages they cause. This paper explores whether the same holds for apologies.
